1 Introduction

This document is intended to document all the things that can be done with “non-weird”, Markdown-inspired syntax.

2 Features

2.1 Basic

These are some very basic features that can be used:

1. title and date taken from name of `.md` one, or uses today’s date if none specified
2. author defaults to Sophie Bartlett
3. `.bib` file with same name as `.md` loaded automatically
4. auto-conversion of double quotes (see Introduction above)
5. bold, italic and `fixed-width` text

6. numbered lists (like this one)
7. table of contents, lists of figures/tables, bibliography and index placement
8. parenthetic citations (Jones 2000) as well as direct ones, like Smith (2001)
9. simple indexing of terms using hopefully intuitive syntax
10. inline mathematical expressions, like $y = f(x)$
11. sections and subsections

2.2 Additional

Here are a few more features, broken out separately mainly to demonstrate subsections, but it also gives a chance to show blockquotes:

Blockquotes, like this one, can be used when you need to add a sizeable portion of text from a book, speech or other source, and format it so that it stands out more clearly.

It also provides an opportunity to see how subsequent paragraphs are formatted (they are indented rather than “skipping space”, though this can be changed at a later date if it’s preferable.

It also gives a chance to show a different type of list. This one is bulleted—also known as unordered—as opposed to the numbered/ordered list used in the previous section.

- bulleted lists (like this one)
- the different dashes: hyphens (e.g. side-effect), en dashes (e.g. 1–2 ideas), or em dashes as shown in the “parenthetical” example above
- addition of appendices (lettered instead of numbered as sections are)
- manual page breaks
